HISTORY OF THE UNION CLUB

PREPARED AT THE REQUEST OF THE

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

S. LOTHROP THORNDIKE.

SKETCH.

The Union Club took its rise in the early months of 1863. This was the darkest time of the struggle for the Union. McClellan's fight at Antietam in September, 1862, had proved a barren victory. He had passed his command over to Burnside, with the result that in December ten thousand Federal soldiers lay killed or wounded upon the field at Fredericksburg. The Emancipation Proclamation, published within the week after Antietam, had for the time united the South and divided the North. The fall elections had almost doubled the opponents of the administration in the popular branch of Congress, and even its professed adherents in that body fell far short of cordial support. The "Southern sympathizers" throughout the North were more rancorous than ever. The war Democrats were discouraged at the lack of military success, and alienated by seeing the contest definitely placed upon an anti-slavery basis. Even many Republicans were distrustful of the policy of the administration and beginning to despair of the republic. The President was spoken of with ridicule, and contemptuous epithets were applied to his ungainly simplicity.

The new departure of the government was especially obnoxious in Boston, as elsewhere, to many men before patriotic. By some of these a commission in a colored regiment was considered a disgrace. Governor Andrew was even doubtful about drilling one of these regiments so near Boston as Readville.

The change of sentiment was most discouraging. "There was considerable talk of the right of secession," writes Mr. C. W. Loring, "and unfortunately among men of social standing. Some of this talk prevailed in our most fashionable club." "The state of feeling," writes Mr. Martin Brimmer, "was more conspicuously critical than patriotic. Some privately denounced the war in all its aspects; some attacked indiscriminately all the acts of the government, and peppered their remarks with a liberal supply of sarcasm; some were indifferent; some were wavering; some, with the best intentions, were made doubtful or timid by the tone of people about them. For those, and there were happily many, who were unhesitating in their support of the government in the war, there was no common centre, no rallying place. We agreed that a club of some sort was greatly needed to serve this purpose."

So the Union Club came into being. It was not intended, like some other leagues, to be itself an active organization against active disloyalty,— for that did not exist in Boston,— nor a rendezvous of partisan politics, but rather a rallying point for gentlemen of intelligence, public spirit, and social prominence, who believed that the Union could be preserved, and that it could be preserved by the announced policy of President Lincoln. Its membership was to consist of clubbable men, who not only thought and felt alike upon the great questions of the day, but who would find it pleasant to meet socially and converse upon those questions. "We want," said one of its founders, "a place where gentlemen may pass an evening without hearing copperhead talk."

Testimony varies a little, as must be the case with recollections of thirty years ago, as to the person with whom and the precise time at which the idea of the club originated. Where so many prominent men were interested and earnest, it would be invidious to award precedence. The matter was perhaps discussed as early as 1861 or 1862, and some of these discussions took place at the house of the late William Gray and at the office of Mr. Samuel G. Ward. A more formal meeting was held on February 4, 1863, at Mr. Ward's house; and it is evident that the active formation of the club was largely due to his energy and executive ability. Subsequent meetings were held in Chickering Hall. An organizing committee of fifteen was appointed, of which the chairman was the late Charles G. Loring, and the secretary Mr. Martin Brimmer. One cannot be far amiss in assigning to these gentlemen, with Messrs. Gray and Ward, and especially Mr. John M. Forbes, who took part in all the preliminary conferences, the honor of being the founders of the club. With these gentlemen were joined upon the organizing committee Messrs. Edward Austin, J. Ingersoll Bowditch, Robert W. Hooper, Amos A. Lawrence, James L. Little, John L. Emmons, Alpheus Hardy, Charles E. Norton, Richard H. Dana, Jr., G. Howland Shaw, and Charles W. Storey.

The constitution which was adopted states the purpose of the club to be "the encouragement and dissemination of patriotic sentiment and opinion." The condition of membership was "unqualified loyalty to the Constitution and the Union of the United States, and unwavering support of the Federal Government in its efforts for the suppression of the Rebellion."

The club took possession of its present quarters at No. 8 Park Street on the 15th of October, 1863, the work of preparing the club-house for use having chiefly devolved on Messrs. Edward Austin, Martin Brimmer, Samuel G. Ward, Francis E. Parker,* and George B. Chase, who received a formal vote of thanks. It is interesting, from both public and private associations, to mention that this house was formerly the residence of Abbott Lawrence, a citizen widely known not only in the business life of New England, but in political and diplomatic service.

Among those who attended the first meetings of the club and gave sympathy and counsel was the venerable Josiah Quincy, Sr. He made a speech full of vigor, to which the members listened with profound interest. It was probably his last speech. He was strongly advocated by the members most aggressive against "Southern institutions" for the first President, but the choice finally fell upon Edward Everett. Mr. Everett was one of the last survivors of the old Webster Whig party. He had held, in the campaign of 1860, the second place upon one of the tickets opposed to the election of Mr. Lincoln. But perhaps the most honorable feature of his distinguished life was the support which he subsequently gave, by speech and counsel, to Mr. Lincoln's administration.

Mr. Everett took the occasion of assuming the presidency of the club to declare its objects and to define his own position at a meeting in Tremont Temple. His address had a good effect, and was the only public declaration which the club ever found it necessary to make. Its establishment was in itself a sufficient declaration.

During the remainder of the war the club amply fulfilled the purposes for which it was founded. It was the gathering place of men whose thoughts were full of the great contest, and of the best means of promoting its success. They came perhaps only to exchange sympathy and encouragement in times of disaster or congratulations in the hour of victory, or perhaps they wished to discuss some matter of practical importance. The influence of the club was felt in forming public opinion and stimulating public spirit.

The social element was not lacking; but even this had its patriotic side, for the guest was apt to be some officer on leave of absence or some civilian fresh from Washington. Sumner often came, and Governor Andrew was nowhere so much at home as here. This was the era of the Dozen Club, a dinner club within the club, which met once a month to talk over public affairs and to entertain men distinguished in civil or military life. Its members were Governor Andrew, Chief Justice Bigelow, Judge Hoar, Charles G. Loring, Richard H. Dana, Horace Gray, Francis E. Parker, James Russell Lowell, Charles Eliot Norton, Samuel G. Ward, Martin Brimmer, and Charles R. Codman.

As the war drew to an end, the celebration of its closing scenes, and the presence here from time to time during the following years of those who had been its heroes, will be remembered as among the most interesting events in the career of the club. One need only recall the night of Lee's surrender and the receptions to Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Meade, Hancock, and Farragut.

During the reconstruction period the club maintained its attitude of avoidance of party politics. The Union had been preserved. Upon the question precisely how it should be reconstructed there were as many shades of opinion within the club as in the world outside. But such questions could always be discussed here in the freedom of social intercourse, delivered from envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness. The older members will recollect one occasion when a Southern Unionist, Mr. Parsons of Alabama, was introduced by Henry Ward Beecher, also a guest, and there was a spicy debate upon giving the ballot to the negroes between Mr. Parsons, Mr. Beecher, and Mr. Sumner. This was growing a little too hot, when Governor Andrew intervened and stopped it, as contrary to club rules.

It may be said, once for all, that the position of the club upon the various political and economical questions which have arisen since the war has been one of non-partisanship; but it has not been one of indifference or lukewarmness. The club has always stood for good government and for whatever would make the civil service better and purer.

It may be thought that the foregoing sketch presents the club in too grave an aspect. It is, after all, and always has been, a club, — a place where a member can eat his dinner and read his newspaper and play his game of cards or billiards. If it has had beneath all this an element a little more serious, it is perhaps none the worse for that.

The club now exists, and will surely long exist, for purposes of social intercourse and convenience. The vital questions which have agitated its members of late years have been mainly those of personal comfort, — how they should be lighted and warmed and served, the opening of their house on Sundays, the establishment of a table d'hôte, the enlargement of the house to its present ample dimensions, the conditions and limitations of the exercise of hospitality, and, above all, the selection of new members.*

It would be pleasant, if space allowed, to gather personal recollections of the various social meetings which have taken place within our walls, and to try to report the sparkling talk of the great conversers of the day who have been present as members or as guests, — Hoar and the two Danas and Lowell and Fields and Lee and William Hunt and Charles Storey and George Davis and Whipple and Woodman. One might also tell of the smaller circles within the circle that have from time to time existed; of the nightly assemblages around the table d'hôte, always adorned by the noble presence of Charles Devens, whose memory the club will long keep green; and of the dinners of the Election Committee, meetings so delightful, when Colonel Lee sat at one end of the table and General Devens at the other, that the members of the committee never resigned, and had finally to be rotated out of office by a change of by-law. All this must be relegated to the books of personal reminiscence, the writing of which is the duty of all men of advanced years who have been familiar with the men and manners of the past. One thing, however, deserves especial mention; and that is the fact that our house was for a time the gathering place of the illustrious Saturday Club, to which fact we owe the occasional visits of Whittier, Longfellow, and Holmes.

*One marked change from earlier days has been the vast extension of the privilege or the despotism of tobacco. The single room originally set apart for smokers is now the only room from which cigars are excluded.

It only remains to speak of the membership of the club, of which the standard has been so high that the names of most of the men prominent in Massachusetts during the last fifty years are inscribed upon our rolls. One may find there governors of the Commonwealth, members of both branches of Congress, celebrated merchants, manufacturers and financiers, men noted in science, literature, and art, distinguished army officers, and so many eminent judges and leaders of the bar that this used to be called, and may still perhaps be called, the lawyers' club. Many of these men of note have already been mentioned. To extend the list from among the living would be unfit; but from the honored dead we may surely select the names of Emerson, Agassiz, Adams, Sparks, Howe, Palfrey, and Hedge.

Names like those which have appeared in these pages in themselves create a standard of membership. We may probably never again collect in our house so illustrious a band. We can only take heed for the future that no one shall find a place here who is not worthy at least to stand upon the same roll with those excellent men, and who would not be ready, should occasion call, to stand for the right as they did.

This brief sketch cannot better be ended than by again recalling the origin of the Union Club. The clause in its organization promising support to the government in the suppression of rebellion is a page long turned;— a page of history never, it is hoped, to be repeated. The promise still as fresh and binding as ever is that of the encouragement and dissemination of patriotic sentiment and opinion, that of unqualified loyalty to the Constitution and Union of the United States.
